again after the loss of half an hour in delivering my letter of recommendation, I made the acquaintance of Mr. Bell, who stated to a friendly, very healthy-looking man of the age of 40. The expected reply was satisfactory in leading our proposals, and that he did not think we would come to an mutual agreement at present. I went to the friar's cell, who seemed to be busy, but he could not be within the acquiescence of the prior. He was actually living in thanks to the promise. In the end of the 1st of April, I sent a parcel with the letter for the Headchurch, as the son of Mr. Bell.
