green foliage (leaves) form the greenifying aspect of summer. The villages and small towns, which we got in view during our visits, were like the quiet, green fields of England. In spite of the fair weather, the rain threatened us with showers, and we were not able to look far. The country presented a most magnificent aspect, which we were able to appreciate fully. We saw extremely well-cultivated fields, tended by nice neat hony workers, who with their yellow baskets, which covered their heads, went from Liverpool to London on Sunday afternoon. The road from London to Liverpool has all 220 miles in length, which are perforated by the excavations in the rocks.
